Mental health is a pressing concern for college students, hindering their academic performance and personal growth journeys. The COVID-19 pandemic and its drastic change to students' day-to-day lives has made this crisis even more urgent.

Although US higher education institutions offer formal mental health support, many are too overextended and financially strapped to provide support to students in crisis, and stigma still prevents many from seeking help. As a result, university services are failing to reach students when they are at their most vulnerable.

To help students thrive, universities must strengthen social support networks. HearMe is the leading peer support solution already being used by tens of thousands around the world that can help your students as soon as they need support by connecting them with people who want to listen.

"I used to say that as director of counseling and student health that health takes up 25% of my time and counseling took up about 75% of my time. Now student health takes up about 10% of my time!"

Alex Wang
 Student Health Director & Counseling Director
 Lippin University New Orleans

Peer-to-peer support is a critical component of student wellness and resiliency, and digital peer networks can put this proven method in reach for all students. HearMe for Students can create and/or improve existing peer support offerings through an anonymous, easy-to-use platform that can relieve pressure on your student services, improve retention, and provide immediate support—all at an affordable price.
