Brief Artist Bio

Celeste Malvar-Stewart has been creating clothing for over 25 years. Her main focus is on sustainable and ethical practices in art and design; and is most recognized by her ethereal high-end gown and dresses that she creates by hand-felting wool, alpaca, and mohair from Ohio family fibre farms atop silk fabric, often incorporating natural dyes and using rain water in her felting process. She is formally trained in fashion in London, England and acquired a Master's degree in textiles in Michigan, USA.

Her work has been shown in various national and international exhibitions, books, and magazines, mainly featuring experimental aspects of her art in fashion and textiles.

Her current focus is in exploring the realm where fashion meets fibre art in her effort to continue trying to translate her essence into form. She collaborates with many other artists within various disciplines to further expand her creative process while also expanding its audience. She emphasizes the importance of connection through art, working closely with Ohio women farmers and using fibres from their happy animals who she knows by name! Thus far, the results have yielded the creation of clothing, accessories, objects, and interiorwear that are thought provoking and empowering.

"After so many years of creating clothing, textiles, and art, I am finally able to really enjoy the exploratory aspect of the way I create. It's always been innate, yet I've fought it, thinking that my creativity should stay focused in order to be understandable. Now, I enjoy trying to understand my own work and happy to hope that others understand aspects of it too! My creative process is always evolving, and I've become fascinated with breaking my processes down and then recreating from that new place...construction to deconstruction to reconstruction...from fabric to fibre to yarn to fabric. It seems random, but it's actually very thoughtfully and carefully orchestrated."
